Reports conflict on Trump health

BY JONATHAN LEMIRE, JILL COLVIN

Washington — President Donald Trump’s doctors released conflicting reports Sunday on his health amid concerns about the path ahead for the 74-year-old’s fight against COVID-19.

Dr. Ronny Jackson, the president’s personal physician, said Trump had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.

The changing, and at times contradictory, accounts created a clear credibility problem for the White House and raised new questions about the president’s health as it answered as Conley offered no updates over the president’s condition, and the president’s doctors, who took pains not to reveal the president had received supplemental oxygen at the White House before being flown to Walter Reed National Military Medical Center. Medical staff had arranged a two-minute video on the president’s condition Sunday afternoon, the doctor said, and that was a “false good” report, he said, sitting at a desk. He offered thanks to medical workers.