QUEBEC VOTES 2012

Charest fuels referendum fears

The Marois plan: mingle and listen

VINCENZO D'ALTO/THE GAZETTE

MONTREAL BY MÉTRO In a bid to mingle with voters, Parti Québécois leader Pauline Marois took the métro from Laval to the Atwater Market on Thursday before stopping in at Magnan's for lunch. Page A6

Not voting could pave the way for a referendum, Premier Jean Charest warned on the second day of the provincial election campaign. Kevin Dougherty reports Charest cautioned voters looking for an alternative to his Liberal government, but not comfortable voting for the other parties, against simply staying home on election day: "There are two ways to get a referendum in Quebec," Charest told reporters. "You either go out there and vote for Madame Marois ... Or you stay home and you don't vote." Page A7

A PROPER ROLE FOR BILL 78

There's no place for Bill 78 on the election trail, but use of the law to enforce a right of return to school would be valid. Editorial, Page A16

LIBERALS' LOFTY JOBS GOAL

The promise to create 250,000 jobs would usher in an employment rate not seen since the '60s. Peter Hadekel asks: Is it realistic? Page B10

APPEAL FOR PROTEST CALM

Student leaders are appealing for calm during the campaign, cautioning supporters not to do anything that could boost Liberal support. Page A6

The Aveos component repair business could be sold to a U.K. firm, a move that would save 300 local jobs. Page B10

Liverpool is a paradox of a film: a throw-back romantic comedy with a modern, inadvertently timely feel to it. Page C1

'Mission impossible' after all? A frustrated Kofi Annan walks away from trying to solve the crisis in Syria. Page A2

It's another silver for Canadian rowers in London. A day after the men's eight team finished second, the women made a solemn pledge and did the same. Page B1

QUOTE OF THE DAY
