Jim Crow to Medal of Freedom

Maya Angelou, a child of the Jim Crow South who rose to international prominence as a writer known for her frank chronicles of personal history and a performer instantly identified by her regal presence and rich, honeyed voice, died Wednesday at her home in Winston-Salem, N.C. She was 86. Her literary agent, Helen Brann, confirmed the death but said she did not know the immediate cause. Angelou had heart ailments and had been in declining health for years.

Her son, Clyde "Guy" Johnson, an author who lives in the Oakland hills, told KTVU that he would miss his mother's "love and ability to call her. I left her last message on my phone and I'll never take it off."

Angelou established her lit-

SANTA BARBARA RAMPAGE

Senate: Focus on mental health

No point in reviving gun-control bills in Sacramento, Steinberg says

By Jessica Calefati

SACRAMENTO — Days after a disturbed Santa Barbara college student went on a murderous rampage that left seven young people dead, Senate Democrats have introduced a set of proposals to change the way California's criminal justice system treats the mentally ill.

Introducing perhaps his last package of legislation before being termed out, Senate President Pro Tem Darrell Steinberg said he wants to expand access to "mental health courts" that favor treatment over punishment, as well as train law enforcement officials how to properly identify and interact with mentally ill people on the street.

Speaking at a Sacramento news conference Wednesday, Steinberg also dismissed any chance of reviving several gun-control bills introduced in response to the mass shooting at Connecticut's Sandy Hook Elementary School and vetoed last year by Gov. Jerry Brown, even while relatives of the Isla Vista gunman's victims begged the state

Hide-and-seek for dough gets rise out of valley

By Bruce Newman

bnewman@mercurynews.com

SAN JOSE — In a place with as much money floating around as Silicon Valley — where billionaires are a dime a dozen and many tech entrepreneurs won't get out of bed unless they can get paid six figures for it, a man calling himself @HiddenCash on Twitter quickened the valley's pulse by leaving tiny piles of cash that, in the end, didn't add up to much, but meant a lot.

Conducting what his Twitter feed describes as an "anonymous social experiment for good," the media-savvy but camera-shy micro-philanthropist unleashed a one-day bombardment of Benjamins on the city Wednesday. There were five money drops in all, and as he doled out clues to their location via tweets, normally sane citizens scurried

RACE AND GENDER IN TECH

Google sets tone for a serious debate on workforce diversity

If you care about the diversity of the tech industry, then give Google some credit after it released Wednesday, for the first time, the demographics of its workforce.

Not so much for the numbers themselves, which illustrate how far the company has to go to create a truly diverse workforce, but for its willingness to shed light on the issue.

After I wrote a column on the issue of diversity and tech, Google gave me an advance look at the makeup of its workforce before releasing it publicly.

The statistics are detailed but easy to sum up: Google is still mostly a white male tribe, especially in tech jobs and leadership roles. Men make up 70 percent of its global workforce and hold 83 percent of what it calls tech jobs. Whites are 61 percent of its U.S.

Google demographics

Google's workforce is mostly male and white or Asian, with few minority groups represented.
