Britain, world look at picking up pieces

Vote to exit the EU leaves nation reeling, with no precedent to point a path forward

The economy: Already sending markets into a tailspin, Great Britain's departure from the EU will ripple across the Atlantic into the U.S., experts say. »15A

Political aftershocks: U.S. presidential candidates address developments, with Trump taking celebratory tone and Clinton warning of troubling economic results. »19A

LONDON» Britain has jumped. Now it is wildly searching for the parachute.

The U.K.'s unprecedented decision to leave the European Union sent shock waves through the country and around the world Friday, rocking financial markets, toppling Prime Minister David Cameron and even threatening the ties that bind the United Kingdom.

Britons absorbed the overwhelming realization that their anti-establishment vote has pushed the British economy into treacherous and uncertain territory and sparked a profound crisis for a bloc founded to unify Europe after the devastation of World War II.

"Leave" campaigners hailed the result as a victory for British democracy against the bureaucratic behemoth of the EU.

Conservative former London Mayor Boris Johnson said "the British people have spoken up for democracy in Britain and across Europe," while Nigel Farage, leader of the hard-right U.K. Independence Party, said "the dawn is breaking on an independent United Kingdom."

But for the 48 percent of British voters who wanted to remain — and for the 2 million EU nationals who live and work in Britain, but could not vote — there was sadness, anger and even panic.

At a London train station, commuter Olivia Sangster-Bullers called the result "absolutely disgusting."

"Good luck to all of us, I say, especially those trying to build a future with our children," she said.

The decision launches a years-long process to renegotiate trade, business and political links between the U.K. and what will become a 27-nation bloc, an unprecedented divorce that could take a decade or more to complete.

Cameron, who had led the campaign to keep Britain in the EU, said he would resign by October and left it to his successor to decide when to invoke Article 50, which triggers a departure from European Union.

"I will do everything I can as prime minister to steady the ship over the coming weeks and months," a somber Cameron said outside 10 Downing St. "But I do not think it would be right for me to try to be the captain that steers the country to its next destination."

He also said he had spoken to Queen Elizabeth II "to advise her of the steps that I am taking."

TANK'S FOR THE MELODIES

Rusting water-storage vessel offers much more than heavy metal

By Jason Blevins The Denver Post

RANGELY» Bruce Odland was a long-haired aural artist in the 1970s, a wild-eyed hippie who traversed the country recording unique sounds for his eclectic albums. He was rambling through north-west Colorado in 1976, gathering sounds for a roaming arts festival when a pair of roughnecks picked him up in their truck. He said he was seeking sound. They brought him to a 60-foot-tall water tank on a muddy hill above Rangely.

They showed him a small portal at the base of the steel tank. Slide in there and turn up your recording equipment up to 11, they said. It was pitch black inside.

"I can't believe it, but I did it," Odland says.

Bottles clanged as he shuffled in the hot darkness. The two men slammed the outside of the tank with lumber. They hurled rocks at the steel walls. Awash in euphonic echoes, Odland hatched a vision that 40 years later has become rural Rangely's one-of-a-kind Tank Center for Sonic Arts.

Hold up. What the heck is a center for sonic arts?

"We don't know that yet," says Lois Lafond, an always-laughing Boulder musician and teacher who was among the first sound seekers to join Odland and embrace the tank as a sort of audio laboratory.

"The people will tell us what it is," says Odland, 64, who recently spearheaded two crowdfunding campaigns to buy the former water tank and transform it into what they hope will become a local treasure and an international destination for sound artists.
