A FAMILY AFFAIR

With a baby in a swing on one side, and two 400-pound Bengal tigers on the other, a fence often sums up Vicenta Pages' work-life balance.

» The show

The Pages' White Tiger show runs at 6 p.m., 7 p.m. and 8 p.m. at the Kids Korral in Island Grove Regional Park each weeknight during the Greeley Stampede. On weekends it runs at 12:30 p.m., 3 p.m. and 7 p.m., also at the Kids Korral.

Pages grew up in a family that owned and trained exotic animals, such as elephants, tigers and lions. She toured with Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey for four years, before settling down and growing her family — both feline and human.

Pages, her husband and two children tour the U.S. doing educational performances with their seven Bengal tigers.

Her show was part of the Greeley Stampede on Friday, even if evening rains forced the postponement of one performance.

"It's not easy raising tigers," she said, before beginning her show.

Her 7-month-old son, Davio bounced on her hip and tried to smile with his tiny fist between his gums.

"Our life revolves around them," Pages said. "One of us always has to be with the tigers and one of us has to be with the kids."

Page's 4-year-old daughter, Vanessa,

What vote tells us about U.S. presidential election

By David Goldstein
Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — The Britons who voted to take their country out of the European Union were predominantly white, working class, older and deeply upset about immigration.

Their leaders drew scorn from the university-educated elite as nativists, borderline racists and occasional buffoons. Backing them was too risky, opponents said.

A British referendum and a U.S. presidential election are, of course, different: For starters, the U.S. has a significantly larger, younger and more racially and ethnically diverse population than Britain.

About 15 percent of the British electorate is nonwhite, compared with more than 25 percent in a presidential election in the U.S., noted James Morris, a British pollster and adviser to former Labor Party leader Ed Miliband.

But in both countries, voters appear divided between those who feel — as Trump repeatedly says — "we have no choice" but to embrace radical change and those who fear that the kind of change offered by him, and the Brexit

"Brexit" is Trump. Trumpism is everywhere. It's the same phenomenon, with the same results," a European diplomat told reporters on Friday, speaking
