Arizona sued over paid sick leave law

Legislators, city officials cry foul

MACAELA J. BENNETT

A new state law that prohibits municipalities from enacting ordinances that require businesses to provide paid employee sick leave is being challenged in court by more than 30 state legislators and five members of city councils from around Arizona.

Tempe, Tucson and several other municipalities were debating such ordinances when Gov. Doug Ducey warned in January that cities adopting employment ordinances would lose state-shared revenue.

The lawsuit, filed last month, argues the law contradicts cities' rights to legislate protections for workers and families.

"Local jurisdiction over wages and benefits makes sense because economic conditions across communities vary," said Eva Putzova, a Flagstaff councilwoman and plaintiff in the lawsuit.

Tucson Councilwoman Regina Romero, also a plaintiff, said cities should be able to discuss with local businesses what regulations would work for them and their employees.

Two days after they were found dead in their homes from an apparent murder-suicide, Eileen Yellin and Cathy Baker were scheduled to go to court to discuss multiple orders of protection the two Phoenix women had filed against each other.

The women had accused each other of threats and trespassing in the year leading up to their deaths, according to court records. They were scheduled to appear in Phoenix Municipal Court on Monday at a hearing about the orders.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION

JACK GRUBER/USA TODAY

Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton, the first woman nominated for president by a major political party, speaks Thursday in Philadelphia.

'We are not afraid'

Clinton says she'll be a steady hand in a complicated world

Promising Americans a steady hand, Hillary Clinton cast herself Thursday night as a unifier for divided times, an experienced leader steeled for a volatile world. She aggressively challenged Republican Donald Trump's ability to do the same.

"Imagine him in the Oval Office facing a real crisis," Clinton said as she accepted the Democratic nomination for president. "A man you can bait with a tweet is not a man we can trust with nuclear weapons."

Introduced by her daughter, Chelsea, Clinton took the stage to roaring applause from flag-waving delegates on the final night of the Democratic convention, relishing her nomination as the first woman to lead a major U.S. political party. But her real audience was the millions of voters watching at home, many of whom may welcome her experience as secretary of State, senator and first lady, but question her character. 1B

For Arizona women, historic nomination transcends politics

For decades, parents have been telling their little girls they can grow up to be anything they want to be — even president of the United States. And while the little girls and their parents may have believed this, it had never happened.

On Thursday, that dream became a reality as Hillary Clinton accepted the Democratic nomination for president, becoming the first woman to lead a major-party ticket.

But even a historic first of this magnitude, like everything in the political realm, is filtered through the prism of America's political, generational and social divides.

Clinton is, without question, a com-
